Sue,

You can find recent data on blood lead testing in Flint at this website: www.michigan.gov/flintwater. Please bear in mind that with the recent upswing in testing, including many children a bit older than the usual target ages, the findings may be a bit different from usual.

Thanks,
Bob

Hello Sue.

I am passing your request to Bob Scott who may be able to answer your question. However he will need to know specifically what you need. I know he is swamped so if your request is for personal curiosity it may be a lower priority for him as we are really busy pulling together information to help the community at this time...I know you will understand....

FLINT's GHHL site is non-existent at this point.

I am well and good this with all this attention!

Hope you are doing well as well.

Hi Wes,

I imagine that the Flint disaster is keeping the state lead programs busy. The newspaper only talks about the increased number of children who are testing positive for lead but they have not said anything about what the average lead levels are. Do you have any idea what they are finding? Is there someone else that I should be asking this question to?

Isn't Flint one of Ruth Ann's cities?

Hope that you are well.

Sue
