Bob is going to do option 3, and let them know if they want to use it for other things, then we will have to work on the map.

Option 3 was the presenter's intention as far as I know. We could stipulate "no hard copy, no posting" as a condition of providing them the map.

I guess this makes your life a little more complicated. Let's discuss.

If the observations are geocoded to the street address, I would be uncomfortable sharing it as part of a public presentation except under three options:

- 1) The "point" is randomized. That can be done and still preserve clustering, which is what I think the county wants to show. The map label can indicate that the locations have been adjusted for confidentiality purposes. Someone on the fifth floor could help with randomization if needed.
- 2) Have attendees sign a confidentiality agreement but that is not going to be possible if there are more than a handful in the audience.
- 3) Show the map for a limited amount of time but attendees are not provided a hard copy and the map is not posted on a web site.

It helps that the data cover multiple years.

Option 1 is preferred for a public presentation. Option 3 is also doable. If the presentation is just to health department staff I don't see a problem in presenting the information as is.

Corinne,

Please see the attached map. I don't see it as violating confidentiality, but I've no expertise in this. Should this be sent to Colin Boes or someone else for confirmation that it's ok to present?

GCHE requested a map with kids with elevated BLLs. They want to use it in a presentation, as I understand it.. Please see attached. Does this violate confidentiality?
